Uniforms that carry your brand

UniformEdge

SCHOOLS · CORPORATE · HEALTHCARE · HOSPITALITY · INDUSTRIAL

Every uniform tells an organisation's story.

Every uniform should look like it belongs to the school that wears it.

Most schools inherit their uniform supplier the way they inherit a photocopier contract — whoever was there first stays by default, and the uniform ends up looking like everyone else's. We started UniformEdge around a simpler idea: a school's uniform is part of its identity, and it should be built that way.

In practice that means matching your crest thread-for-thread, matching your colours to the actual palette in your branding guide rather than to the nearest available shade, and staying with your school year after year instead of forcing a fresh vendor search every time something needs reordering.

Built to your identity

Your crest digitised and stitched to match, and fabric matched to your official palette before production starts — not approximated after.

Made to survive a school year

Colourfastness and shrink-control testing before bulk cutting, and reinforced stitching at collars, cuffs, knees and seat.

A partner, not a transaction

One relationship managed year to year, so the uniform programme becomes one less thing for your team to manage — not one more.

UniformEdge traces its roots to Neeraj School Uniforms, founded by Ramesh C Verma as a small shop in Subhash Nagar, Delhi, in 1995. UniformEdge and Neeraj School Uniforms are separate businesses in the same family. Neeraj continues to trade; UniformEdge carries the same tailoring heritage forward into its own manufacturing.

Five sectors, one facility

Schools are our core, and the sector our tailoring roots come from. The same cutting floor, colour matching and quality checks now dress offices, hospitals, kitchens and industrial sites.

Corporate Uniforms

Front-office and field staff dressed consistently across every branch, in your brand colours.

Healthcare Uniforms

Scrubs, lab coats and staff wear for hospitals, clinics and diagnostic centres — colour-coded by role.

F&B & Hospitality Uniforms

Chef wear, service uniforms and aprons for restaurants, hotels, cafés and catering operations.

Industrial Uniforms & Workwear

Coveralls, work shirts and high-visibility wear for factories, warehouses, logistics and site teams.

Every programme is quoted per client. Garment mix, order volume and customisation scope all move the price, so we do not publish a rate card we would have to qualify in every conversation.

Corporate uniforms that hold a brand together

A corporate uniform is a brand asset that walks around. When a customer sees your team at a branch, a site or an event, the uniform is doing the same job as your signage — and it fails in the same way, by drifting out of colour and looking tired.

GARMENT	DETAIL
Formal shirts & blouses	Half and full sleeve, in brand-matched colours with optional logo embroidery
Blazers & waistcoats	Structured tailoring for front-office and customer-facing roles
Trousers & skirts	Cut to a consistent house specification across sites
Polo shirts & T-shirts	Smart-casual and event wear, embroidered or printed
Jackets & outerwear	Softshells and windcheaters for field and site teams
Ties, scarves & accessories	Colour-matched finishing pieces that tie the look together
Custom-branded T-shirts & hoodies	Your logo embroidered or printed — event, campaign, offsite and new-team kit, on a quick turnaround

Consistency across branches

Garments for every location produced in a single batch per colourway, so one branch's uniform matches another's.

Tiered by role

Front-office, back-office and field teams often need different garments reading as one identity — distinct but visibly related.

> A corporate uniform is signage that walks around. We manufacture against your brand palette rather than a nearest-match shade, and apply your logo from a single approved artwork file — so a shirt made for a new joiner in month eighteen still sits beside the original intake without reading as a different colour or a slightly different mark.

One specification across every branch

Each colourway is produced in a single batch wherever possible, so one location's uniform matches another's rather than arriving a half-shade apart.

Role tiers that read as one family

Front-office, back-office and field teams get different garments built from the same palette and detailing — visibly distinct, visibly related.

Top-ups on the same spec

New joiners are dressed from the approved specification without re-quoting or re-sampling, so onboarding is not held up by uniform lead times.

Custom-branded apparel, quick turnaround

T-shirts, hoodies and shirts carrying your logo — for events, campaigns, offsites and new-team kit — produced on a short turnaround alongside the main programme. Exact timelines are confirmed at quote, against artwork and quantity.

Healthcare uniforms built for hard laundering

Healthcare uniforms are laundered harder than almost anything else we make. They are washed hot, washed often, and expected to hold both colour and shape through it. Fabric and finishing decisions that are merely nice-to-have elsewhere are the whole job here.

GARMENT	DETAIL
Scrub sets	Top and trouser, colour-coded by department or grade
Lab coats	Full and half length, with optional name and role embroidery
Nurse tunics & dresses	Cut for a full shift's movement, with contrast trims by grade
Theatre and procedure wear	Made to your department's specification
Warm-up jackets	Layering for cold wards and night shifts
Support & housekeeping wear	Distinct colourways for non-clinical staff

Built for hot, frequent washing

Colourfastness and shrink-control testing before bulk cutting matters more here than in any other sector we serve.

Colour-coding that stays exact

If grades are distinguished by colour, drift between production runs defeats the purpose. Every reorder is matched to the original reference.

> In a hospital or diagnostic centre the uniform is wayfinding as much as clothing: a patient reads department and seniority from colour before they read a name badge. We hold those colours exactly across departments and across reorders, so the coding a facility designs still means the same thing two years later.

Colour coding held across departments

Each department's colourway is fixed in the specification and matched at production, so scrubs ordered a year apart still group correctly on a ward.

Built for the laundry cycle

Garments are specified for repeated high-temperature washing — the failure here is colour loss and seam wear long before it is style.

Sized for shift work

Staff are measured rather than assumed, and we hold the size grade so replacements fit the same person the same way.

Replacement stock without delay

Standing reorders for new staff and worn-out garments, produced against the approved specification.

Poly-cotton blends for scrubs and tunics, where shape and colour survive repeated hot washing better than pure cotton. Specific finishes — fluid-resistant or antimicrobial — are specified to your requirement rather than assumed.

Kitchen and front-of-house, dressed for the job

Hospitality asks two different things of one uniform programme. The kitchen needs garments that survive heat, oil and daily washing. The floor needs garments that look composed at the end of a long service. They are rarely solved by the same fabric.

GARMENT	DETAIL
Chef coats & jackets	Double and single breasted, long and short sleeve
Chef trousers	Loose-cut for kitchen heat, in checks or solid colours
Aprons	Bib, waist and cross-back, in brand colours with optional embroidery
Front-of-house shirts & blouses	Service wear that holds its press through a shift
Waistcoats & service jackets	For formal dining and hotel front desk
Headwear & neckwear	Caps, skull caps, chef hats, neckerchiefs and ties

Kitchen versus floor

Breathability and stain tolerance in the kitchen; drape and finish on the floor. Same identity, different specification.

Stains and hot washing

Kitchen wear is laundered aggressively and often. Darker colourways and tighter weaves stay presentable considerably longer.

> Front-of-house uniform is the first thing a guest reads about a property, usually before anyone speaks. We work from your interior palette and brand marks rather than a hospitality catalogue's defaults, so the floor team looks like part of the room they are standing in.

Matched to the property, not a catalogue

Colours taken from your interior and brand references, so the service uniform and the room it works in belong to each other.

Separate specs for kitchen and floor

Kitchen and front-of-house face different demands — heat, staining, movement, presentation — and are specified separately while staying one visual family.

Built for heavy rotation

Hospitality garments are laundered constantly. Fabric and construction are chosen for that cycle rather than for showroom appearance.

Fast replacement

Single-garment reorders against the approved specification, so a damaged jacket does not leave a section short.

Heavier poly-cotton for chef wear, where durability and stain tolerance lead. Lighter blends front-of-house, where appearance and drape lead. Garments intended for food-handling areas are specified to your operating requirements.

Workwear that survives the shift

Industrial workwear is judged on how long it lasts and how well it protects. A garment that looks correct on day one and fails at the knee in month three costs more than the one that was specified properly.

GARMENT	DETAIL
Coveralls & boiler suits	Full-body workwear with reinforced stress points
Work shirts & trousers	Heavier-weight everyday wear with utility pockets
High-visibility vests & jackets	Reflective tape configurations specified to your site requirement
Dungarees & bib overalls	For workshop and maintenance teams
Jackets & cold-store wear	Insulated layers for outdoor and refrigerated environments
Caps, aprons & accessories	Task-specific finishing items

Reinforced where it fails

Knees, seat, elbows and pocket mouths take the load. Double stitching and bar-tacks there decide whether a garment lasts a year or a quarter.

Fabric weight to the task

A warehouse picker and a workshop fitter need different cloth. Specifying one weight across a site over-serves one group and under-serves the other.

> Workwear is the least likely uniform to be treated as branding and one of the most visible — on a site, in a yard, in front of a client's own customers. We carry your marks onto durable workwear properly, applied so they survive the same laundering the garment does.

Specified against the actual work

Garments chosen for what the job does to them — abrasion, heat, oil, weather — rather than from a general workwear range.

Consistent across shifts and sites

One specification covers every site, so staff and contractors across locations read as one organisation.

Branding that survives the wash

Logos applied by a method suited to industrial laundering, not a finish that lifts after a season.

Replacement without downtime

Standing reorders so worn or damaged kit is replaced against the approved specification quickly.

Heavier cotton and poly-cotton drills for durability and abrasion resistance. Specialist protective finishes — flame-resistant or chemical-resistant — are sourced and specified against your stated requirement, not offered as a blanket claim.

Uniform styles

These are AI-generated placeholder images, standing in until our real photoshoot is complete. They do not depict actual students, actual garments, or actual product photography.

Built to survive daily wear

Pure cotton

Breathable and soft against skin. Best for warm-climate daily wear; shirts and summer sets.

Poly-cotton blend

Wrinkle-resistant and faster-drying. Holds shape and colour through frequent washing.

Terry cotton

Heavier weight for trousers and skirts — better structure, less see-through in light colours.

How we manufacture

UniformEdge operates its own manufacturing facility in Delhi, giving us direct control over cutting, stitching, and quality checks.

For specialised requirements and peak-season volumes, we also work with trusted outsourced production partners — without compromising on our quality checks.

What happens to our offcuts

Cutting a uniform order leaves fabric behind. Rather than discard it, we reuse our offcuts as packaging material for the garments we send out — so the waste from one order protects the next one in transit.

> That is the extent of what we claim today. We hold no environmental certification, and we would rather name one practice we actually follow than publish a sustainability policy we do not yet live up to.

How ordering works

01

Consultation

We learn your school's identity, size spread, and current uniform pain points.

02

Design & colour match

Crest digitisation and fabric colour-matching against your official palette.

03

Sampling

Physical samples sent for approval before bulk cutting begins.

04

Measurement drive

On-site or self-service sizing so every student gets the right fit.

05

Production & delivery

Bulk production against the approved sample, delivered ahead of term start.

06

Reorder program

A standing reorder relationship, so uniforms don't need re-sourcing each year.

We also run school uniform programmes

Schools are our founding sector and still our largest. If you are also involved with a school — as a parent, a trustee or through a CSR programme — the same programme discipline applies there, with parents ordering directly from us so the school carries no stock and no admin.

School Uniforms

Our founding sector, and the one our tailoring roots come from — full uniform programmes for schools across Delhi, from KG through senior years.

How Schools Should Choose a Uniform Manufacturer

Most uniform supplier decisions are made on price per piece and regretted on the reorder. Here's what to evaluate instead.
